They insure that the constitution operates in accordance with prevailing constitutional values, existing conventions may evolve and new one image, in line with changing practice and changing attitude. In this way significant conventional change can occur over time, without any fundamental change in the law. Conventions play a significant role in the UK convention. For example, in theory the monarch can refuse to enact law that have been passed by both the House of commons and House of Lords. In practice, how ever dictates convention that they automatically approve any bill that has been passed by both house.
